Session 92: A Liberated Mind: Using ACT to Manage and Lead Instructor: Steve Hayes, Ph.D.

Steve Hayes returns to the show, just about one year after his original appearance.

In this episode, Steve provides a quick overview of Relational Frame Theory, as well as its relationship with Acceptance and Commitment Therapy. He also answers listener questions on this topic. We then spend quite the majority of the interview discussing the use of ACT in the context of leadership and management. Specifically, Steve talks about using ACT for, preventing and responding to staff burnout, “dealing” with a difficult work environment, managing “difficult people,” and, optimizing staff performance.

Along the way, we frequently reference A Liberated Mind. Which contains a lot of background information for interested listeners. We also discussed a few other resources, including:

- The Prosocial.world website.
- The Maslach Burnout Inventory.
- Bond & Bunce \(2000\).
- Bond & Hayes \(2002\).
- Steve's website, where you can get his free ACT Mini-Course.
- Get Out of Your Mind and Into Your Life.

There are 1.5 Type 2 Supervision Continuing Education credits available for participating in this event.

From this training, participants will be able to:

- Identify how Steve thinks the “proof” or validity – i.e., whether it “stands or falls” – of Relational Frame Theory will be shown.
- State examples of how defusion results in a transformation of stimulus function.
- State how describing why you admire someone can help identify your values.
- Identify what Steve thinks will happen if behavioral accounts of private events are not available.
- State one change managers can make to incorporate ACT skills during staff meetings.
- Identify how to begin intervening with “burnt out” staff members.
- State how Steve would go about deciding on whether to leave a job.
- Identify how to incorporate what Steve calls “yearnings” into the workplace to make the environment more reinforcing.
